In Taiwan, many remote areas still seem to suffer from poor access to medical services. To solve this long-standing and complex problem, the use of technology and reforms in medical systems is now being put into action.

Technology has played a key role in improving rural health care. Medical institutions, such as Kaohsiung Medical University Hospital, have created smart health tools to support doctors and nurses working in hard-to-reach places. For example, they use a special app with a GPS map system that helps health workers find patients living in mountain villages. The app shows who has been tested for diseases like hepatitis C, who needs treatment, and even how far patients are from the health workers. This system helped Taoyuan District reach a 99% screening rate and a 95% treatment rate, making it the first area in Taiwan almost to eliminate hepatitis C. In addition, one-stop health check machines have been installed to measure temperature, blood pressure, cholesterol, and blood sugar. These machines are fast and easy to use, even identifying patients' faces if they forget to bring their National Health Insurance cards.

Meanwhile, the government has made important changes to support rural health care workers. Public-funded medical students now receive better training and guaranteed salaries than before. In return, they are required to serve in rural areas for up to ten years after graduation. This helps reduce the number of doctorless villages and allows young doctors to gain experience while receiving fair pay and support from medical centers. With these combined efforts from medical teams, new technology as well as government policies, Taiwan is moving toward a future where all people—no matter where they live—can enjoy safe and equal medical care.

35. What is the main idea of this passage?
(A) More medical workers are serving in rural areas.
(B) New diseases are spreading in remote villages.
(C) Technology and teamwork improve rural health care.
(D) Taiwan's government has increased hospital budgets.

36. According to the passage, how does the GPS-based app help health workers?
(A) It allows patients to contact doctors 24 hours a day.
(B) It displays patient locations and their medical records.
(C) It gives medicine to the sick automatically.
(D) It provides instructions in local languages.

37. Which of the following pictures best shows the one-stop health check machines mentioned in the passage?
(A)
(B)
(C)
(D)

38. According to the third paragraph, "doctorless villages" are rural areas _____.
(A) having no regular access to medical care
(B) short of public-funded doctors
(C) with a large number of doctors
(D) without enough patients

Natural disasters, such as earthquakes, wildfires, and typhoons, often leave thousands of people without homes. Finding safe, cheap housing for disaster victims has become a global challenge. One creative solution is the “SuperAdobe” house, a type of building made from long sandbags filled with earth, stacked in circular layers, and held together with barbed wire. These houses often have round, dome-like shapes, which give them natural strength and stability. Because of their special structure, they can survive extreme weather and even powerful earthquakes.

The SuperAdobe method was invented in 1984 by Nader Khalili, an Iranian-American architect. He originally developed this idea for NASA as a way to build homes on the Moon or Mars. Later, he realized that the same idea could help people on Earth—especially those living in disaster-prone or poor areas. To share his idea, he founded the Cal-Earth Institute in Southern California, where people from all over the world come to learn how to build SuperAdobe houses. One famous example happened during a wildfire in California. While many homes were burned to the ground, a SuperAdobe house remained standing. This caught the attention of the public, and the number of people visiting the Cal-Earth Institute quickly tripled.

SuperAdobe homes are not only strong but also eco-friendly and affordable. Most of the materials can be found on site, which cuts costs and waste. These homes can be built by hand, without expensive machines or large teams of workers. The thick walls made from earth help keep the inside temperature comfortable, conserving energy and money.

SuperAdobe houses have survived disasters such as the Nepal earthquake, Hurricane Maria in Puerto Rico, and wildfires in the U.S. Today, people in Taiwan and other countries are starting to build them. With climate change making natural disasters more common, SuperAdobe homes offer a smart way to protect people and the planet.

39. Which of the following is the best title for this passage?
(A) An Eco-Friendly and Disaster-Resistant Housing Method
(B) The History of Wildfires in California, the U.S.
(C) Modern Houses Made of Glass and Steel
(D) SuperAdobe: How NASA Builds Homes on Mars

40. Which of the following pictures best shows a SuperAdobe house?
(A)
(B)
(C)
(D)

41. According to the passage, which of the following statements is NOT true?
(A) SuperAdobe buildings are likely to be seen in Taiwan against natural disasters.
(B) SuperAdobe houses were originally designed for use on the Moon or Mars.
(C) SuperAdobe homes require expensive machines and many workers to construct.
(D) SuperAdobe structures have survived natural disasters like earthquakes and hurricanes.

42. According to the passage, why are SuperAdobe houses considered eco-friendly?
(A) They are made of local, natural materials.
(B) They have thin walls to save materials.
(C) They rely on electricity to keep warm.
(D) They use heavy machines to build quickly.
